Every glyph of this paragraph is placed on its own, the way a printing system writes text it has already laid out: the words have no space characters between them, only gaps.

This paragraph is printed upside down in a flipped coordinate system and flipped back by its text matrix, one glyph at a time, as a browser engine writes a page.